New research suggests reindeer and humans have collaborated for millennia as the Arctic's distinct climate warmed following the last ice age. As climate fluctuates, ever-changing permafrost preserves a record of the past. Climate change is affecting places on a massive scale, including the Arctic. It will move the tundra and permafrost towards and away from the sun depending on temperatures and the sun's angle in the sky. It will also affect the weather. And this weather will become more extreme as the climate warms. To read what scientists think has happened in the past can help us predict what might happen in the future. Researchers have just published the most extensive study of its kind to date. They reveal that humans and reindeer were actually colonizing the Arctic at the same time, 2.6 million years ago, and that the climate fluctuated following the last ice age. "This research shows how much we are learning from archaeological data," says geographer Dr Roland Ennor of the University of Nottingham, UK, who led the study. "It is still relatively young, but our work is beginning to shed light on one of the most important periods in the climate history of the planet," he says. The study focused on a period of gradual warming between the end of the last Ice Age and 400,000 years ago. This period saw the end of an epoch of glaciation that had been freezing the earth for thousands of years. This warming enabled climate conditions favorable for the colonization of formerly uninhabitable regions. The Northwestern European Arctic was a very cold and inhospitable region when humans first began to appear in the area. The region had been free from human habitation for at least 20,000 years. However, during this period it was not as warm as it is today, and no ice sheet blanketed the area. During the period of gradual warming between the end of the last ice age and 400,000 years ago, huge glaciers and ice sheets appeared in North America and northern Eurasia. Large regions that were not previously habitable or even known, became occupied. During the period in question, the Arctic was clearly warmer than it is today. The researchers suspect that today's warming, and this warmer climate, were conducive to the colonization of the arctic. "For this period the arctic experienced a short interval of warm and arid climate," says Dr Ennor. "This is interesting given that the current warming periods are
